Theoretical and experimental studies of the steady state and dynamic properties of Bragg grating-loaded photonic crystal fibers (PCFs) under visible light excitation are presented. The simulations and experiments are based on the use of a PCF operating as a Fabry-Perot laser cavity. Effects of the PCF core diameter on the steady state and dynamic characteristics of the PCF are studied. The optical output power of the PCF as a function of the PCF core diameter shows that the larger the core diameter of the PCF, the greater the threshold of the guided mode resonance. The threshold behaviour of the PCF has also been found to be in good agreement with that of the conventional silica-based PCF. The results also show that the threshold of the

PCF is much higher than the value of the conventional silica-based PCF. Finally, the stability of the PCF under
